That Ear Ring.

Senator Chandler having published a letter to the people of his State denying the fact that Senator Blackburn pulled his ear, Senator Faulkner, of West Virginia, an impartial witness of the incident makes the following reply through the New York Herald:

"After reading the authoritative statement of Mr. Chandler and noting the spirit in which it is given out, the imputation: not only cast upon the democratic press, but upon the democratic members of that committee, and the attempt upon his part to present Mr. Blackburn in the ludicrous and discreditable attitude of a bully, I feel that in justice to what I conceive to be the truth it should be frankly and without hesitation given to the public personally. I regret the necessity of being involved in this controversy since it has reached the public, especially as the relations between Mr. Chandler and myself during the last two sessions of the Senate have been personally friendly. The following extract, which I herewith clip from Mr. Chandler's statement, is substantially correct as far as it goes, and will save repetition on my part:—

"The committee was in session, no person being present except the five members and the clerk. As chairman I was reading the draft of the report. Senator Faulkner remarked that he thought I undertook, in a certain paragraph, to assert something which had been mutually agreed should not be claimed. I said that I did not think so and that I would read the clause again. Mr. Blackburn vehemently intervened and said that I was certainly violating the understanding, and that it would so appear if I read the paragraph again and read it exactly as I did before.

"I asked him what reason he had for intimating that I would falsely read the paragraph. He replied that he thought so because it would be like my whole action in the case, and that he considered me capable of doing anything to serve a partisan purpose. Then ensued an angry colloquy, which I cannot undertake to produce with accuracy. I said that I resented his imputation and he replied defiantly. At some point he made a charge on my official integrity and I made most bitter imputations upon him. I do not remember the order of sequence. Then he, making some threat of personal violence (I do not recall the words), started around Senator Faulkner, who was beside him, toward the end of the table, where I sat with Senator Cullom at my right. I said that he did not dare to do what he had threatened."

"In this statement," Senator Faulkner continued, "Mr. Chandler fails to repeat the offensive utterance made by him which so angered Mr. Blackburn. It was this: 'I do not propose to be bulldozed by any Kentucky negro driver.' When I heard that expression from Mr. Chandler I turned to look at Mr. Blackburn, who was on my left, to see its effect upon him. His face manifested the most intense excitement and almost uncontrollable rage, and I appreciated the fact at once that the words controversy between these two gentlemen was to be brought to a prompt conclusion.

"Mr. Blackburn, in a moment or two, arose from his chair, at the same time intimating his purpose to make a personal assault upon Mr. Chandler. He walked around my chair to the head of the table, where Mr. Chandler continued to sit without the change of a muscle or the utterance of a word. Mr. Chandler is mistaken when he says that at this point of the controversy either Senator Cullom or myself interposed between him and Mr. Blackburn.

"Mr. Blackburn stood over Mr. Chandler's chair some moments using language which would convey to the mind of anyone the doubt existing in his own mind as to what course he should pursue, inasmuch as Mr. Chandler still remained seated, and it was impossible for Blackburn to strike him—which was manifestly his purpose—in that position. A moment's reflection seems to have decided him, and to the best of my recollection and belief he used the expression:—'Damn you, I can't strike you while you are sitting down, but I can show my contempt for you by twisting your ear.'

"Accompanying that remark with the action, he caught him by the upper part of the ear and gave it a contemptuous twist; not apparently with a view to personally injure Mr. Chandler, but as I supposed at the time to cast an indignity upon him. Seeing that Mr. Chandler made no resistance to the action of Blackburn, I rose from my seat, pressed Mr. Blackburn and said: 'Mr. Blackburn, as Mr. Chandler has not seen fit to resent what you have done to him your own honor and manhood demand that you should not either by word or act interfere further with him.'

"Mr. Blackburn therefore replied, 'Faulkner, you are right. I'll go to my seat.' Senator Cullom was at the time endeavoring to quiet matters. Senator Blackburn, at my request, agreed that he would take no further part in the discussion of Mr. Chandler's report, leaving the matter entirely to me. I am not willing to state that Senator Platt saw the transaction as I describe, because of the position he then occupied in the room, but from the position taken by Senator Cullom, I am satisfied that what I saw he must necessarily have seen also."
